The court's action disposed of the last of the contempt cases resulting from wholesale signing of "resolutions of defiance" of anti stree speaking injunctions issued by Judge Humphries.

In answer to a number of complaints the governor said he did not wish to call a special session of the legislature to consider charges and he had no power to remove Humphries. He decided, howver, to come here after he had received following telegram, signed by the editors of the Seattle Post-Intelligencer,

Seattle Sun and Seattle Star. "An abnormal and disturbing situation exists here which, in our opinion, calls for your immediate intervention. By an astounding and unprecedented exercise of power on the part of a superior court judge, who is to-day mentally unfitted for judicial service, thirty seven persons, PARTS OF BODY several of them women and most of them citizens, and none of criminal record, are confined in jail for having displeased this court. We believe it to be your duty to pardon these persons at once, in the interest of human rights and fair play, and thus, in a measure, relieve a situation which is now unbearable and may easily become menacing. On one day Judge Humphries imposed heavy sentences upon those who came before him and denounced other superior court judges, one of whom, after a conference with others, issued writs of habeas corpus for the prisoners. At the next appearance in court of the Social-ists Humphries met them with a smile and levity and remissions of sentences
